Unlike the normal NE602 receiver circuit, in this circuit, the oscillator coil is connected to the input of the mixer. The regen control potentiometer varies the bias of the oscillator. It still needs some work but I am certain there are many NE602 receivers out there that can be modified to test this out.

Mainly in the amateur radio side of things. Look at the NE602 datasheet though. More applications in there. I haven't used that part for a very long time but the local osc if based on an xtal just requires a couple of NPO ceramic discs. No amplification or buffering is required. As for colpits, check the datasheet for the NE602.

The NE602 through the SA612 series are all virtually identical Gilbert cell-based integrated circuits. Little changed in the Signetics and Philips designs. They have been very popular with designers of ham radios, including Elecraft, Small wonder Labs, MFJ (Rick Littlefield, K1BOT's "Cub" series) and many others as RF mixers and product detectors.
